New Orleans, LA	The Administrators of the Tulane Educational Fund Jobs for the Future/OYIF	The Cowen Institute and the EMPLOY collaborative are leveraging and coordinating education, training, and job placement services to enable youth to enter postsecondary career pathways in the region's high-growth industries. Partners include a high-performing community-based youth development organization with extensive experience serving opportunity youth along the pipeline to career-track employment; a community college with a strong integrated ABE-to-credentials model; and Tulane University, the city's largest employer, which is modeling for other employers the benefits of partnering with community organizations and training providers to create earn-and-learn pathways to career-track employment for opportunity youth. The majority of youth served by these programs are youth of color, and over half are young men. For those without a high school credential, Delgado Community College's Accelerated Career Education (ACE) program and the Youth Employment Project provide High School Equivalency programming along with life coaching, case management, and career-focused technical and academic skills training. For those with a high school credential, the initiative offers several options including youth enterprises and Tulane's Earn and Learn, which offers young people co-enrollment in Delgado Community College, as well as paid apprenticeships at Tulane in fields related to their program of study. Bard Early College of New Orleans (BECNO) will provide technical assistance support on curriculum and instruction with the goal to create a "playbook" of the most effective practices for developing pathways to postsecondary education and careers for opportunity youth. Additionally, members of EMPLOY are creating a data network that allows for streamlined intake, assessment, and referral of youth across youth-serving organizations and educational institutions. This network is expanding EMPLOY's understanding of the causes of local disconnection as well as promising reconnection strategies, and informing decision-making at the practitioner and systems levels. Partners are currently targeting the following sectors: skilled crafts, creative digital media/IT and health care. They expect to scale through engaging additional anchor employers in the initiative.
